

Katie Singer

Katie Singer has an MFA from Fairleigh Dickinson University and is a lecturer in the department of Literature, Language, Writing & Philosophy at Fairleigh Dickinson University in Madison, New Jersey. She is the Director of the Minor in African-American Studies as well as Chair of the Developmental Writing Committee for the College Writing program.

Katie has taught writing workshops in composition and creative writing, as well as African-American literature courses. She has sat on panels at various conferences, most recently at the New Jersey College English Association Annual Spring Conference held at Seton Hall University.

Her writing consists of short stories, poems and essays; she has published in various literary journals and newspapers including most recently The Paterson Literary Review and Delaware Valley Poets Anthology.

Her most recent international literary experience took place at the International Conference on the Short Story held in Cork, Ireland June 2008. There she presented a paper entitled; Labels in Learning and Literature and gave a reading of her short story, Oranges.

Katie is originally from Ann Arbor, Michigan where she first became enamored of all things athletic, especially tennis and football. She is a proud mother of two children, ages fourteen and sixteen, and lives in Montclair, New Jersey.